The content, look and feel and style of many presentations today, especially those from global organisations, is largely determined centrally, so at a local level there is less emphasis on the actual development of presentation elements such as graphics, templates & fonts.

From the presenters point of view therefore, the importance shifts towards adding key 'messages' and the actual content 'delivery'; so a new and different range of skills need to be developed in order to deliver presentations more professionally, and with confidence.

'Moving Beyond Bullet Points' is all about developing confidence. The better the presenters habits are, the better they will be in pressure situations, and learning new and different skills leads to a better understanding of the Why's not just the How's of easily delivering engaging, effective and memorable presentations.
